NĒ (νῆ), i. q. nē (ναι). See NĀ.

NĒ, adv. Not; it is used only as a conditional or dependent subjective negation, i. e. where only the conception of a thing is negated, but its actual existence is left undetermined, while non denotes an absolute objective negation, i. e. the denying of the existence of a thing. USAGE.

I. In conditional or dependent clauses: Not, that not; ne sit sane summum malum dolor, supposing it to be (that it is not) the greatest evil, Cic.;—ne fuerit, there may not have been, id. II. With independent clauses which contain a command, prayer, demand: Not. 1. With an imperative: ne iura, do not swear, Plaut.—2. With a subjunctive expressing command: ne confers culpam in me, do not lay the blame, Ter.—3. Expressing a wish, prayer, or the like: ne sim salvus, Cic.;—ne vivam, may I not live, id.;—ne id Jupiter sineret, Liv.;—utinam ne, Oh that—not! Ter. III. With other particles: dum ne, provided that not, as long as not, while not, Cic.;—modo ne, provided only that not; ne . . . quidem, not even; in which case the emphatic word is placed between these two particles, e. g. ne in oppidis quidem, Cic.;—ne mulieribus quidem, Cæs. Sometimes a negative word precedes without destroying the negation: non enim prætereundum ne id quidem, Cic.;—numquam ne mediocri quidem cuiquam, id. In the sense of I will not say, not to mention: ne convincente quidem, sed etiam . . . oculis intente, Cic. IV. Put for modo ne, only not: ne illis sanguinem nostrum largiantur, Sall. V. Put for ne dum, much less, to say nothing of: ne vero nihil istorum, ne juvenem quidem movit unquam; ne nunc senem, Cic. VI. Denoting purpose: That not, in order that not, lest; id ergi, ne interesse, Cic.;—ne dicam, lest I may not say, i. e. not to say, id. Ne in connection with ut is, properly speaking, a pleonasm, not differing perceptibly from ne alone, except that it chiefly occurs in solemn discourse, and hence especially in laws. It is sometimes placed apart from ut, but always immediately before the word which it particularly bears upon: præcipiendum est igitur ut . . . ne existim, that they may not believe, Cic.;—ut hoc ne facerem, that I should not do this on any consideration, Ter. VII. Expressing a prohibition. 1. After verbs which express fear, anxiety, danger: That, Gr. 638. There is always as the foundation of this form of expression a wish that the thing may not be so or may not occur; e. g. vereor ne hoc fiat, I apprehend that it may happen (but I wish it may not): metuebant ne indicarent, Cic.;—hic, ne quid mihi promogetur, horreo, id.;—also after substantives which imply the idea of fear, anxiety, etc., e. g. periculum est, ne occasio deat, Nep. In all cases, that not, lest is expressed by ne non or ut: veritus ne hostium impetum sustinere non posset, Cæs.;—vereor ne exercitum firrum habere non possit, Cic.—2. After verbs denoting fear, foresight or caution: That not, lest; cave ne studeas, Ter.;—cave ne cupias, id.;—videat consul ne quid detrimenti capiat republica, Cic.;—also denoting to see, look into, examine, consider whether perhaps, etc.; videamus ne beata vita ellici posset, Cic.—3. After certain verbs denoting negation, esp. after those which signify to deny or answer negatively, to refuse, to hinder: That; cusus quidem ne fecerim impedit, hindered my doing it, Cic.;—Decii corpus ne inveniretur nox quærentes oppressit, the night hindered its being found, Liv.;—unus ne caperetur urbs causa fuit, was the sole cause that hindered the capture of the town, id.

NĒ [in poetry, we often find it apocopated: egon', viden', for egone, videsnel]. As an interrogative particle, enclitic. In simple and direct interrogation ne has no English equivalent, but in indirect or complex interrogation it is commonly rendered whether. I. In a simple interrogation, directly interrogatory with an indicative: videturne hoc tibi verum esse? does this (indeed) appear to you true? Cic.;—and also with a subjunctive: putarene unquam accidere posse, ut? can you suppose that? id. II. In a double or complex interrogation, when it takes after it the interrogatory particles an, annon, necne; in direct question: Romanne venio, an hic manes, an Arpinum fugiam? Cic.;—honestumne factu an turpe? id. Ne is sometimes used in the second question for an: iustitiane prius mirer belline laborum, Virg. If the second contains simply a negation without a verb, this is expressed by annon, an non, or nec ne: isne est quem quero, annon, Ter.;—nescio tun scias an non? Plaut. The poets sometimes join ne to words to which it does not belong: scannum faceretne Priapum, a bench or a Priapus, Hor.;—this ne is also frequently appended to other words, e. g. to the pronouns qui, quæ, quod, Plaut.;—also to quia, Virg.

R

R, r. The seventeenth letter of the Latin Alphabet, in the middle and at the end of a word is sometimes used as a later form instead of s. Thus we have the two forms honos and honor, *arbo*s and arbor, lepos and lepor; quæso and quæsumus for quæro and quærimus; asa, lases, plusima. As now ara, lares, plurima, and dirimo is formed from dis-emo. R is sometimes assimilated with l; hence, libellus from liber, intelligo from inter-lego, pellicio from per-lacio. It is sometimes used for d, as meridies for medidies. As an abbreviation, R stands in most cases for Romanus in S.P.Q.R.; or in R.P., for res publica.

SESTERTIUS, a, um (semis, tertius). Two and a half. I. Sestertius, ii, m., sc. numus.

A sesterce (marked HS., i. e. ii. and semis). A silver coin = two asses and a half, the fourth part of a denarius (value about two pence sterling = three cents and nine mills). I. Prop.: s. duodeni, Cic.;—s. singuli, Plin. Frequently with numus, Cic. In the genit. plur.: Sestertium (more rarely sestertiorum, Col.). Sestertium numum, Cic. Also with the symbol HS., ap. Cic.

From the frequent use of the genitive form sestertium with numerals above a thousand, it happened that very early (although not before Augustus), this genitive sestertium was mistaken for a nominative neuter, and so they not only formed the plural sestertia, but declined even sestertium as a noun singular. Hence it came that sestertium (with the omission of mille) denotes a sum of a thousand sesterces (= £8, 17s. 1d. English money, about 39 dollars of our money); and with the multiplicative adverbs decies, centies, etc. (omitting centena millia implied), it indicates a sum of a hundred thousand sesterces; consequently, decies sestertium, i. e. decies centena millia sestertiorum, ten times a hundred thousand sesterces, or a million; centia sestertium = ten million of sesterces; sexcenta sestertia = 600,000 sesterces, Cic. Maon.: numo sestertio or sestertio numo, a small sum, a trifle, Cic. Under the emperors also, a copper coin of the value of four asses, Plin. II. Sestertium,
